

THE GAZETTE.

TUESDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 9

A SURE WINNER.—Cincinnati had a queer gambler. He would wager with himself, and was correspondingly sailing ecstatically on a wave of success, winning or losing. In sporting parlance, he was constantly at "horse and horse" with himself, and he found in that double-headed condition the highest delights of anticipation. Although he lacked the determination to actually bet, still he haunted the pool and card rooms with his hands in his pockets, juggling his silver coin and transferring his money from one pocket to another, according to whether his right or left side won. He kept a regular account mentally with his right and left hands, and thus realized all the excitement of betting without being subjected to the liability of dropping his wealth, but at the same time he was constantly on the verge of actually participating in the game, but never could muster up courage to deposit his money on the table. His great scheme was to select a number in the Louisiana State Lottery, which he would carry in his head, and he awaited the report of the drawings with feverish anxiety, which for several days previous to the event almost prostrated him, so nervous and worked-up would he become. One time he actually won the capital prize in this way. The gain of so much wealth, in his mind, proved to be a shock he could not withstand, and superinduced an attack of brain fever, which proved fatal.
